>Jack Overland looked at the brown haired teen talking with his friends. He watched him as the boy smiled his lopsided smile and rolled his eyes at what one of his friends said, he didn't really care. Apart from the stretch of skin he saw as he did so. Jack's eyes sharpened at the thought that ran through his head.

He really needed to get a new fixation. Really he did. But this oneâ€| just kept dragging him back. Not paying him any attention. Not even looking at him. That was unacceptable.

Jack watched the teen longer from where he stood in the middle of his own group, everyone trying to get his attention. So what made the little dorky kid so much more special than the many cool kids surrounding him?

"Hiccup." Somebody called from behind him and the brunette turned immediately to see who it was. His brilliant green catching Jack's breath for a second. The eyes bright and shining, happy and beautiful looked his way. But he even though jack knew that the boy wasn't looking at him it didn't matter. He got to see those eyes again and that was worth any amount of stalking and staring.

"Hey." Hiccup called out in a somewhat timid voice and jack smirked. Hiccup was all well when in his group but when he had to stand out he became shy. Wellâ€¦ that may have been jack's fault but let forget that for now.

A senior walked past jack to reach Hiccup and his group of friends. He watched as they all greeted the teen. He watched as the black haired guy ruffled Hiccups' hair making the younger blush, grinning happily up at the older.

Unconsciously jack fisted in hands.

This was not going to go on for long. Not if jack had a say in it. 'cause a smile is not what belonged on that face.
